

Counter Offers

What to consider when your current employer makes a counter offer

Before you panic and make a quick decision, take a moment to ask yourself these questions:

What bridges will you burn?

If you go all the way through the hiring process only to accept a counter offer from your current employer then it will be difficult to be considered by the same company in the future.

If it's a company you respect and would like to work with you might be shutting a door you'd rather keep open. If you are sure on accepting the counter offer, ensure you communicate your reasoning clearly with your recruiter and employer to avoid burning bridges.

What is your employer's reason?

Employers often make counter offers in a moment of panic but after the initial relief passes, you may find that your relationship with your employer and your standing with the company has fundamentally changed.

Your employer is now aware you are looking to leave and in the worst case scenario your company may be biding time to search for a replacement. You might turn down your other offer and accept your employer's counter offer only to find yourself out sooner rather than later.

What are the long term advantages?

Yes you finally got that pay rise you wanted from your employer, but think about what it took to get it.

You need to have one foot out the door to get paid the wage you wanted and there's no reason to think that future salary increases will be any easier. Once you've threatened to leave and then stayed at a company for more money your reputation could be affected and it's likely you'll be overlooked for future promotions and pay-rises for some time.
